“ Gram it has been a little more than a month and I can finally write on this Words can describe how much I miss you. Everyday I think about you and I can't help but cry thinking about all the wonderful moments you are missing. I still get home from school and and pick up the phone to call you and tell you about all the great things that happened that day. I start to dial your number and realize you are no longer there to answer the phone. All those 3 X a week call I took advantage of and I wish I could have just one more to hear you answer by saying " Hello". I can still her you say hello in my head and I hope I never forget it. When mom told me what happened to you I felt like the whole world had stopped and been destroyed. That night when I was out with my friends I got a strange feeling that something was wrong so I texted dad and grandpa asking if you were ok. The responses I got was "I love you". I instantly knew something was wrong but just kept quite till I got home, sure enough you had passed away. The day after you had passed I was driving and I heard a song on the radio talking about how somebody is always one call away and how they were there to save the day. This song instantly made me think of our relationship and how we talked almost everyday on the phone. Whenever the song comes on, if I am on my way to school, work, or with family or friends I can help but just sob thinking about how we will never talk again. Sometimes I think it is you that plays the song because it seems to come on when I am thinking about you. I find myself talking to you on my way home from school or work and just telling you about my day, thinking and knowing you are listening to it. Gram you will forever hold a enormous part in my heart and I will never forget your voice. I will never forget the fishing, crazy squirrel, watching "UP" and seeing you bawl at your favorite movie and of course my last time saying good bye to me and seeing you mouth the words I love you. Hugs and kisses to heaven. As we used to say good by on the phone (kiss sounds) xoxoxox

Love always and forever,
Caitlin
